Featuring Special Guest Lecturer Rebecca Vidra

Rebecca Vidra is a Senior Lecturer of Marine Conservation and Ethics at the Nicholas School of the Environment. She is a transdisciplinary scholar and teacher, interested in the spaces between ecological and cultural restoration, science and ethics, and hope and despair. Her current work focuses on coral reef restoration and on the role of equity in restoration planning processes. She teaches a wide range of courses, guiding students to explore their sense of purpose, develop strategies for coping with climate anxiety, and to see themselves as part of a web of committed people working for change around the world. She looks forward to exploring Norway, a leader in ocean sustainability in both the public and private sectors. From aquaculture to offshore wind, Norway is an innovation hub of the "blue economy" while also experiencing a range of effects of climate change. Our travels will give us ample time to reflect on how a country can effect major transitions in multiple sectors, while we are inspired by the scenery and creativity of the Norwegian approach.
